ASSESSMENTS HAVE BEEN called on the assessable stock of this company as to become due and payable at the office of Castle & Cooke, Ltd., on September 15, 1900, 10 per cent ($10 per share); delinquent October 15, 1900.

W. A. BOWEN,
Treas. Wailua Agr. Co., Ltd.

A MEETING of the Honolulu Rapid Transit Company held yesterday morning, Manager Ballentyne was directed to begin track-laying immediately. Preparations are now being made for this. The first line will begin at the junction of Alexander street and Wilder avenue, along Wilder, Pensacola and Lumalia streets to Alapai street, thence down Alapai and South streets to Queen, up Alakea to Hotel, along Hotel to its junction with King street, thence along King to Liliha street, along Liliha to Wyllie.

The company will build a steel bridge of its own across Nuuanu stream at the end of Hotel street, as the Tramway Company has its tracks on the King street bridge and travel is much congested at this point. By putting in a separate bridge, traffic will not be interfered with. The company expects to have this line completed within the next three months.

The line on Queen street to Waikiki and up Alakea, Emma, Punchbowl and Pauoa will probably be built next and the other lines in succession.

Work on the power house will go on rapidly and it will be up in a short time.

THE NEW YORK MONEY MARKET.

A decidedly firm tone was displayed in the New York loan market as late as the first of October, says Bradstreet's. Calls for funds are being made on the Associated Banks from the South and West, and estimates of the amount of currency shipped directly or transferred through the Treasury this week were fully equal to the $7,000,000 lost in this way a week ago. It is, however, noted that over $3,000,000 of gold has been transferred through the Treasury from San Francisco to New York this week. Another poor bank statement is expected today, and while bankers generally feel that no severe pinch in the money market is likely, the curtailment of supplies of funds causes a very firm tone, while the demand for time loans is also much brisker. This is particularly true in regard to arrangements running over the election or January 1. In some cases lenders are not making loans for sixty to ninety days and 5 per cent for anything beyond the latter period. There is also more scrutiny of collateral and loans on industrial command an advance over the rates for those on mixed securities. Commercial paper is firmer, and the advance of rates has attracted some fresh outside buying. The supply of prime paper is also better. Rates are based on 4-1/2 to 5 per cent for double names. Call money has been fairly plentiful at 1-1/2 to 2 per cent, the latter being the figure adopted in a majority of cases.

WORKERS AND WAGES IN HAWAII.

A dispatch from Honolulu says that the laborers who continue to work on the plantations will not do more than 75 per cent as much labor per day as they did when they were under contract. In addition to this, wages have gone up nearly five dollars a month. The planters do not consider the situation satisfactory; but how about the laborers? Would not most of us prefer to have our labor hours shortened and our wages increased? That is what annexation was intended to do.

ELECTION WILL AFFECT HAWAII'S FINANCES.

Politics have entered largely into the commercial affairs of the Pacific Coast and in its relations with Hawaii, and the result of the election means much to the financial interests of the islands. If Bryan is elected many sugar contracts will be void. If McKinley is elected the contracts will continue in force. A San Francisco brokerage firm writing to a local brokerage firm sends the following letter, which arrived on the Coast:

"Messrs. Politz and Brown leave for the East in a few days in relation to their scheme for listing in New York. They will succeed I have no doubt, if the Republican party wins the election. Everything is being done with relation to that event."

"Contracts are being made here with the clause, 'VOID IF BRYAN IS ELECTED.' Betting on the election in the New York Stock Exchange has been at odds of 10 to 4, but now it is almost at even money."

LINCOLN BROUGHT TEARS TO EYES OF STERN JUDGE

THIS little curtain raiser to the character of Abraham Lincoln has waited forty years before taking its place in the repertoire of plays which have come out of that dramatic career. For its preservation, lovers of Lincolnian lore are indebted to attorney C. M. Hardy, of the Chicago bar, whose fortune it was to witness the incident.

Sometime in 1859 or 1860 Mr. Hardy, then a law student residing in Rock Island, Illinois, visited Chicago. Moved by the natural interest of a student for stellar performances in his chosen profession, he found his way to the United States Court for the Northern District of Illinois.

Honorable Thomas Drummond was presiding, and an ejection case was on trial involving the title to lands in the old military tract down about Galesburg, Knox county, Illinois.

The trial was a very important one, as may be known from the counsel engaged. William C. Goudy, O. H. Browning, Archibald Williams, Benjamin S. Prettyman and Abraham Lincoln, were the attorneys, all famous in their time, none of whom are now living. The case had been on trial for several days, and before court adjourned on Saturday evening, Judge Drummond reminded the attorneys that the court would open promptly at 9 o'clock on Monday and requested them to be prompt in their attendance at that hour. Monday dawned fair and free. An early sun, as if to spur the industries of the day, sped its light-darts through the old-fashioned court windows. The room was in its best decorum, with its quaint neatness appealing to the favor of the stern judge who sat erect upon the bench a half hour before the old court clock counted nine. The lawyers were all present, dutiful to his honor's injunction, save the leading counsel, Abraham Lincoln of Springfield.

A half hour passed and the face of the judge grew a shade paler. His dignity had been wounded, his authority had been rebuked, and it could be seen, as he busied his hands in a pile of legal papers, that his mind was turbidly engrossed in maledictions upon the absent lawyer. An hour wore on and the strain grew heavier. The room held a cavernous silence that was almost audible.

AN ANGRY JUDGE.

Suddenly, the judge, after clearing his throat, addressed the attorneys requesting them to proceed without Mr. Lincoln. One of Mr. Lincoln's associates replied, to the effect that his absent comrade had with him certain title papers in the case, and that they could not go on without them.

Again the tenure of punctilio became oppressive, until the hour of eleven, when was raised by the entrance of Mr. Lincoln. While the frame of the delinquent marked its usual ruggedness, his face was pale, his eyes bleak from exhaustion. It was plain as the day that he was disturbed by some unusual happening. He bowed to the court, as was his manner, and took his seat at the long table just beneath the bench.

Almost immediately the judge arose, his face saddening by the pall of some stern idea, his voice husky as if from a parched throat, and with almost bombastic emotion, said:

"The court would have the attorneys to understand that they are officers of this court. Servants of the commonwealth if you will, and the time of this court belongs to not any particular member of the bar to be used for conveniences of his own. It is quite as illegal to rob the court of its time by such dereliction as it is to transgress any of its written laws."

His face was as white as snow. He hesitated, then proceeded to say:

"As your honor knows, I live at Springfield. As soon as court adjourned Saturday, after a hard week's work in this trial, I took a train for home. Called home, in fact, by the distant sobs of a sick child who needed my care, and who, I could not help but feel, would be comforted by my presence at his bedside."

"I arrived in Springfield in the night, went at once to my son. I stayed with him, nursed him and cared for him the rest of that night, all of Sunday and Sunday night until the train left for Chicago this morning. I have not had time nor opportunity to change my clothing, nor scarcely to touch food since I left this room on Saturday—and—my train was two hours late."

Here Mr. Lincoln paused, as though he could say no more. He was about to proceed when an injunction came from the bench.

Before Mr. Lincoln had proceeded far into his explanation, Judge Drummond caught the drift of the recital. His demeanor changed. His face flushed and mellowed. Tears came to his eyes in such succession that his furrowed countenance soon showed traces of his contrition. The judge arose, with both hands raised, as he exclaimed:

"Stop! Stop! Mr. Lincoln, I beg of you, say no more!"

Mr. Lincoln sat down.

After a brief interval, Mr. Browning, who was opposed to Mr. Lincoln in the trial of the case, arose and moved the court to adjourn. That Mr. Lincoln might have the rest he so much needed, and with a choking voice Judge Drummond directed the United States marshal to adjourn the court for the day.

"Just prior to the adjournment last Saturday evening the court requested the members of the bar to be promptly on time this morning, and, as if in direct disregard of that request, the business of this court has been delayed two hours. The court feels constrained to express in most candid terms its utter contempt for such a wanton and uncalled for delay."

Though Judge Drummond's remarks were of a general nature, by the determined manner in which he fixed his eyes upon Mr. Lincoln, the object of his wrath became painfully obvious.

Almost at the beginning of the court's remarks, Mr. Lincoln had risen and remained standing until the speech was concluded. He sat down again without speaking. This action seemed to annoy the court, for he immediately addressed Mr. Lincoln by name, who arose, as if to meet his sentence manfully. The judge continued:

Mr. Lincoln, the remarks of the court were intended for you, and the court expects you to explain why you have disregarded the notice to be in the courtroom promptly at 9 o'clock."

Had Mr. Lincoln been a prisoner at the bar, convicted of a capital crime, replying to that formality, "Have you anything to say why the sentence of this court should not be passed upon you," he could not have appeared more humble, more penitent. His words came slowly and faintly audible, as echoed from a far coast. He seemed to be under great restraint, and his voice grew plaintively pathetic as he said:

"Your Honor: I could explain my absence this morning, but as the explanation would be a purely personal one, I thought the court would not be interested in it. I beg your honor's pardon for the delay."

He then sat down.

The swollen streams of anger which surged through the judge's brain were not to be quelled by such simple words. The court called him to his feet again, and, in tones of imperial fury, demanded:

"If there is any excuse you can make for thus treating the court's request with contempt, I expect you to make it."

Mr. Lincoln looked about him for an instant, as though uncertain what to do. His face was as white as snow. He hesitated, then proceeded to say:

"As your honor knows, I live at Springfield. As soon as court adjourned Saturday, after a hard week's work in this trial, I took a train for home. Called home, in fact, by the distant sobs of a sick child who needed my care, and who, I could not help but feel, would be comforted by my presence at his bedside."
